FROM THE PUBLISHER

The Power of Many as One

I trust I am not alone when I anticipate the fourth issue of Inform each year, because it carries the member and member-firm directories of the Virginia Society of the AIA and clearly demonstrates the force this society embodies.

It is almost a truism that clients recognize the value of those three letters, AIA. But it is true. To the public and related professionals, those letters mean that you are an architect who ascribes to the highest levels of professional and ethical conduct. It also identifies you as someone who understands the importance of professional unity; if you will, the power of numbers.

We can never forget that a large part of the influence of the AIA is that it is an organization made up of involved, erudite individuals who, together, exact a great deal of influence in the public and political realms. Throughout the Commonwealth are architects who sit on planning, zoning, and design-review boards, city councils, and every imaginable community-related organization. Yes, there is a percentage whose time with work and family seems to overwhelm all of the volunteer activity they otherwise would want to undertake. Still, those members, too, find the commitment worthwhile to continue their membership in support of the many activities the AIA undertakes in the way of professional development, lobbying, and public education in support of the important value-adding work that architects do for their clients and the public at large.

In this very issue you will find two articles on the importance of architects working closely with government officials, neighborhood groups, and developers to upgrade successfully the quality of community life—one in a long-overlooked historic neighborhood in Arlington and the other an anchor block for one of that county's most noteworthy development success stories in recent decades. You will also see an informed essay in NetWorks on the new green construction code just released by the International Code Council. Whether it's the right direction right now for Virginia is an evolving debate, and, through readinform.com, you have the opportunity to join in that debate.

In addition, you will find an informed discourse on how global-positioning-system software is changing (some might say invading) our world view as well as a collection of reviews of books that strive to bring us closer to how we understand our world.

As I write this, we are looking at the last half of the summer of 2012. Yet, I am also aware that members, clients, and related professionals value this particular directory issue enough to keep it on hand all year long. With that in mind, let me end in a more timeless way than some reminiscence of, say, the London Olympics (although, with the inspiration of boundless energy and focused talent that the Games always evince, they do provide an important lesson that shouldn't be overlooked):

Even in these seemingly never-to-end days of difficulty (believe me, business conditions will improve, and soon), let us continue to work together—to talk with one powerful voice—to engage and educate clients and community groups, elected officials and appointed ones, school children and university students—everyone we can—so that together we move forward aesthetically, technologically, socially, and spiritually. We must continue to work hard as a professional community to communicate what architects do and encourage the next generation with an overarching credo: We expect no less from ourselves than the best.

The Greening of America

By Nicholas E. Vlantas, AIA, and Deborah Marquardt

The recent release of the 2012 International Green Construction Code (IgCC) has produced spirited debate in our profession, as it seeks to provide a uniform way, or umbrella, to deal with sustainable design.

As the International Code Council reported on March 28, the IgCC is “aimed at helping state and local governments provide direction and oversight of green design and construction.” It is meant to act as an overlay to existing code, with the ability to be customized to fit the needs of local communities. “Coordinated with the ICC family of codes, the IgCC is designed for use in communities that are pursuing sustainable construction above and beyond the traditional level of requirements in our codes,” noted William D. Dupler, president of the ICC board of directors.

Our national AIA thought the issue was important enough to pull up a seat at the table and collaborate with other building industry disciplines, including the U.S. Green Building Council and ASHRAE, over the three years of development. Yet, many remain skeptical.

Current discussion among members of the Virginia Society AIA seems to be taking a contrary view to the code—at least the local jurisdiction language—as the Commonwealth already has the Uniform Statewide Building Code. “Expanding the scope of the Building Code in this manner will open the door to an enormous amount of additional conflict, misinterpretation, and dispute,” writes Matthew Arnold, who has represented the VSAIA on the Virginia State Building Code Technical Review Board since 2003. Arnold was responding by e-mail to questions asked by Duncan Abernathy, VSAIA’s director of Government and Industry Affairs.

We don’t intend to use this space to pick nits over code language. We know there are people who are much more fluent on the issue than we are. Yet on a philosophical level, it is hard to object to the idea of a green code.

When the AIA initiated its goal of achieving carbon neutral buildings by 2030, it reported that buildings contribute an astonishing 40 percent of greenhouse gases and 76 percent of power-plant-generated electricity. For this reason alone, architects need to take a leadership role in supporting energy conservation and promoting sustainable building practices and planning, or we will be left behind.

We have a responsibility to our children and our children’s children to leave the world a better place. Do we want them to inherit an energy landscape like they will inherit our national debt?

Yes, there are dangers in codes written when new technologies are unproven, or with codes that might put architects at risk for long-term building performance. Our personal experience designing student housing has proven that even with all kinds of “green” technologies in place, you can’t make students turn off lights or take shorter showers. In other words, no code can possibly account for the human behavior factor.

Yet let’s look on the bright side. The IgCC may evolve into more effective ways to deal with health and safety issues related to sustainability. The U.S. Green Building Council’s LEED program was a first step, but the costs of LEED certification made it prohibitive for some. The IgCC suggests minimum levels of compliance, but encourages higher levels.

In researching this piece, we read a lot of opinion. The article that resonated most deeply was one on AIA KnowledgeNet penned by A. Vernon Woodworth, AIA, LEED-AP. Woodworth has much experience in architecture, code enforcement, and code consulting and served on the drafting committee of the IgCC. He frames his discussion around a “standard of care” theme. “Every architect assumes a standard of care in the course of his or her professional activities. When codes evolve, so does the architect’s standard of care,” he writes.

“Could the continued construction of inefficient buildings and the propagation of environmentally harmful landscapes in the face of scientific evidence of destructive impacts be equated to the manufacture of tobacco products after a direct link to cancer has been established?”

“The ultimate standard of care is that of the medical profession: ‘Do no harm,’ [a shorthand interpretation of the Hippocratic Oath]. ‘With regard to the environmental impacts of our professional work as architects, why would this not be our standard of care as well?’”

He continues: “Given the role of the architectural profession in designing the built environment, what is our standard of care? We must answer this for ourselves before it is answered for us.”

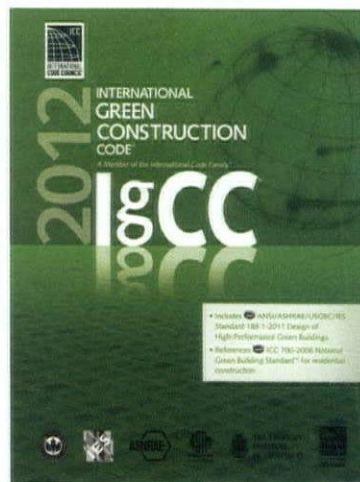

In subsequent e-mail communication with us, Woodworth says: “If architects are worried about increased liability in being responsible for a new code, what about their liability for buildings that pollute?”

Think about it. Might we have worked diligently to provide disability access with ADA, or installed sprinkler systems without a code requirement? What might have been the outcome for Louisiana if it had had a state building code before Hurricane Katrina rather than after?

While many of us would prefer less government in our lives, a recent blog post from Raleigh-based Gontram Architecture, suggests: “The fact is, if left to the marketplace, building design would be unacceptable, discriminatory, and hazardous in many instances. Just because a building owner or tenant can afford to waste massive amounts of energy and water doesn’t mean that they should. In fact, it’s our duty to protect the environment from ourselves. Suffice it to say that a Green Building Code is not the end of the world. It is, however, the only real way to effect change.”

Good design must include effective sustainable strategies. We can no longer separate the two. Above and beyond “code,” this is a value we must incorporate into our work.

Lost Communities of Virginia

By Terri Fisher, Kirsten Sparenborg, and the Community Design Assistance Center, Earlysville, Va.
Albermarle Books; distributed by The University of Virginia Press, Charlottesville
2011, 251 pages, $49.95

This is a book one hopes would come from every school of architecture but, on the other hand, one would not expect because architect-designed works are hardly ever identified, much less discussed. Instead, the research concerns itself with vernacular architecture and the soul behind it. And it covers landscape and architecture with a reverence seldom evidenced in works from university studies.

Kirsten Sparenborg was an architecture graduate working at the Virginia Tech Community Design Assistance Center (CDAC) when she became interested in Virginia's once-thriving communities that barely exist anymore except, perhaps, in past writing or the memories of longtime residents. She began photographing old abandoned buildings that convey, she writes, "a measure of history about the place ... Our surroundings, if noticed, resemble a living ... disjointed, but readable visual narrative ... To complete the essential complement of the physical remnants are the people themselves weathered with experience and age who have seen the changes in their communities that led from boom to abandonment."

The CDAC compiled a list of 130 communities where people still live or gather that once thrived economically and socially and, though in decline, still reveal physical evidence of their past. In all, remnants and long-time residents reveal a sense of each community's uniqueness. The 30 analyzed in this book do not cover all of Virginia. Southern and Central Virginia are the areas best covered. They are organized into basic types: gathering places, farming communities, cultural enclaves (e.g., an Indian reservation), resort communities, resource extraction towns, and company towns.

"The lost communities of Virginia retain enough of their history to help designers learn more about creating successful communities by asking questions that can be answered by longtime residents, community history, and the remaining built landscape," writes Terri Fisher, who completed this monumental work.

This is one of the best books you will read this year, or the next.

—Tony P. Wrenn, Hon. AIA.

Designing Architecture: The Elements of Process

By Andrew Pressman, FAIA

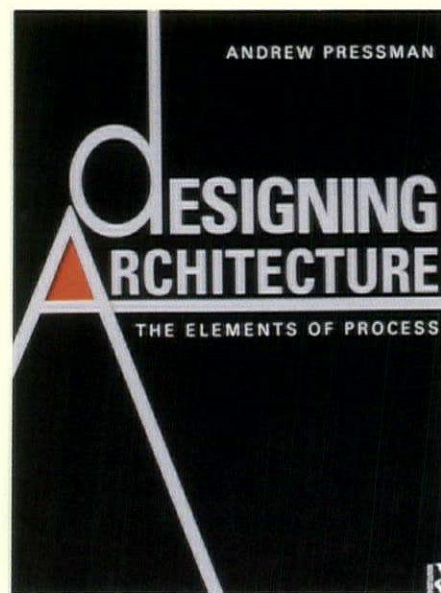

New York City, Routledge

2012, 205 pages, $165 hardbound, $29.99 paperback

Written by an accomplished architect educator with many technical, practice-related, and client-relations books to his credit, this is an eminently readable description of the complexity of what architects do. It comes off as a textbook for architecture students, and one of its early assumptions, as the title implies, is that architecture can be taught as a process. As one progresses through the reality-based explanations of design, though, one realizes a more fundamental assumption here—that artistic and creative abilities are innate to those who would become architects.

So, although reading this book won't magically turn someone into a design savant who previously had no intuitive understanding of aesthetics, what it will do is allow people (even outside that realm of ability) to understand how architects think. And the book is laced with quotations from notable architects on every imaginable facet of the profession—from site analysis and programming to visualization tools, regulations, inter-disciplinary relations, working with clients, accessibility, environmental sensitivity, and all of those other things that inform and shape design. Capping it all off are three case studies, including a poignantly personal narrative of the joys and hardships of cajoling a couple—Pressman's friends, no less—through their home design.

This is a serious discussion of the elements of how architecture is created. It is also a fun book to read and possibly—for architects in practice—to share with your clients to let them know how your creative process works.

The Architecture of Alfred Browning Parker

By Randolph C. Henning, Earlsville, Va.

Albermarle Books; distributed by The University of Virginia Press, Charlottesville
2011, 251 pages, $49.95

Florida Modernism was as nascent as the development of the state itself when Alfred Browning Parker established his toe-hold in the post-WWII era. Cantilevered cast concrete was still something of a new structural system, U.S. Modernism was in its heyday, and Miami architecture was only beginning to develop into the cliché that it would become over the next few decades.

Parker's work is captured oh so elegantly in images mostly by close friend Ezra Stoller and son Bo Parker—black and white, of course, but also in color. The evidence of the architect's admiration of Frank Lloyd Wright (a correspondence acquaintance Parker established as a graduating student via a letter he wrote to Wright out of the blue) is most obvious in what Henning categorizes as Parker's Early and Emergent work (1942-'62).

The Mature and Late design work is more singular in its subtropical influences even as it adheres to principles he expressed in 1960 of "the true and distinctive natural spirit of the thing."

This is a very personal work for Henning, who first got to know Parker in 1983 and began this study of his life's work—more than 500 building designs and uncountable buildings his design has influenced—a decade later. Henning completed the book the same year Parker completed his own life's journey. With a conclusion of essays by Parker himself and his son Quentin, an introductory biography, carefully crafted and illustrated essays of about 70 of Parker's buildings throughout his life (including the homes he designed for himself at every phase along the way), and an exhaustive list of the architect's life's work, Henning—an architect himself—has created a remarkable tribute.

Pocket Guide to Miami Architecture

By Judith Prine McBrien

New York City, Norton
2012, 144 pages, $24.95

If you haven't noticed a subtle theme here, it is the wide range of places and ideas to visit, whether you are looking for historic Virginia architecture or Florida Modern. In the Florida category is a new guide to landmarks, even beyond Alfred Browning Parker.

This pocket guide will point you to every area around Miami, with a foreword by Elizabeth Plater-Zyberk. If you are interested in Coral Gables, Coconut Grove, and Miami-proper architecture, this book will point you there with black-and-white line drawings of the many architectural splendors you would see in person in saturated pastels.

This guidebook organizes 100 architectural highlights into walking tours all around Miami.

Wherever You Go...

Do you know where your phone is? Well your phone knows where you are if it contains location awareness technologies, which open up a world of application possibilities. For instance, if you want to know where the best restaurants or closest cafes are to your current location or what friends and colleagues are hanging out near you, then your phone can tell you so.

Being aware of your place on the planet is something we're going to quickly take for granted as location awareness becomes increasingly integrated into our mobile lives. And the backbone of location awareness is GPS, a technology that not so long ago was mostly being put to use by the transportation and surveying industries. Oh, and also by hikers.

Today GPS is as ubiquitous as cell phones and automobiles, which is where you'll find most popular consumer GPS technologies being used. But GPS technologies are literally all around us and cross the boundaries of our personal and professional lives. We can better understand the scope of GPS technologies through their consumer and professional uses. But first let's take a brief look at what GPS technologies are all about.

Four satellites, one position

The Global Positioning System, originally known as the Navstar GPS, is the United States' GNSS, or Global Navigation Satellite System, a constellation of satellites that provide us with positional data in latitude and longitude coordinates anywhere on the planet. A GPS device can receive data from the satellites to tell you your position on Earth as long as it can access at least four satellites with an unobstructed line of sight. The U.S. has 30 working satellites in operation today. But more satellites would mean better chances of connecting to positional data.

According to Kelly Johnston, GIS specialist for geospatial research at the University of Virginia's Scholar's Lab, the big news in GPS today is that the Russian GNSS, or GLONASS, is now just as freely available to everyone in the world as GPS. "Now devices have worldwide access to U.S. and Russian position satellites to provide more points of access from satellites." That is as long as you have a device that will receive GLONASS signals. Increasingly, since 2011, most professional and consumer grade GPS devices are becoming capable of receiving GLONASS signals.

There You Are

By Will Rourk

Systems integration for survey-worthy accuracy

Accurately finding your position on Earth takes more than just satellite information. Professional GPS demands exact positional accuracy for site survey work. Bill Moore, president of Earth Vector Systems GPS, the main provider for Trimble surveying and mapping equipment and training in Central Virginia, understands that GPS is not just a single device but a system of technologies.

"The measurement process is always contextual," Moore says. "Reception depends on factors such as overhead canopies, satellite positioning, and signal disruption or jamming. You need a sophisticated operating system to collect accurate data."

A sophisticated professional system includes not just a GPS signal receiver, but can also include a base station for logging data remotely, a database for storing the data, and software algorithms such as Differential GPS (dGPS), that can derive more accurate positional data to the centimeter level. A practical example of this setup is a Trimble Geo series receiver working in tandem with a Net R5 base station to accurately log and collect positional data in the field. Using Virtual Referencing Systems, or VRS, Trimble devices can apply real-time data correction algorithms to provide a greater degree of positional accuracy in the field.

It's technologies like these that allow engineering and construction firms to combine GPS technologies with BIM data for automated construction site work. Lasers can guide excavating equipment to provide equipment operators with extremely accurate data provided by a BIM 3D model. The operator uses onboard GPS to compare the amount of land excavated or graded with the BIM model of the site to levels of accuracy that exceed manual survey.

Consumer GPS proliferation

The consumer level of GPS has also taken on a more hybridized form as is evident with our GPS enabled phones. Just as Trimble professional GPS uses dGPS and VRS for deriving accurate lat/long positions, cell phone technologies rely on more than just basic GPS. Since 2011, most smart phones are now GLONASS receivers as well as GPS receivers. But in addition to greater satellite coverage, cell phones also use advanced positional technologies to help locate us.

Simultaneous GPS (sGPS) does what its name implies. It allows GPS smart phones to receive voice data as well as positional data, allowing more sensitive reception as well as the ability of mobile service providers to allow more location-based services. Assisted GPS (aGPS) uses ground networks to provide extra information when conditions for GPS reception are not optimal. This is why you can still find your position when you are inside a building or deep within an "urban canyon" where the density of tall buildings deflects or distorts incoming GPS satellite signals.

Research in urban planning is examining how we can obtain a more qualitative location on the map than just an omni-directional lat/long position. Guoping Huang, assistant professor and researcher in Urban and Environmental Planning at the University of Virginia, is combining GPS with digital compass technologies to produce waypoints on a map that emphasize direction. A GPS waypoint usually only gives us a lat/long or x,y position on a map that is ambiguous to any one direction. Huang sees the value in focusing on a particular direction as a way of measuring the visual quality of a location on a site. His idea is to develop a new positional locator point for ArcGIS—the main map making and analysis tool of GIS developers—that emphasizes direction so that you can load your points into a map project that includes directional data. This would allow planners to provide qualitative location information to those who "want to use this application for scenic value or manage visual resources over time." Using geo-tagged photos, Huang collects visual references of a site into an ArcGIS map over the duration of the site's development, which is then published to the Web for public use and participation. Huang notes that "this will be a big improvement on the geotagging tool, those things you see on Flickr, where it just shows the point. The public wants to understand how the project will look like at different locations" and, with this approach, they "can publish geotagged photos of the site that emphasize location to show how the site changes over time."

Huang's specialized use of geotagged locations could have a big impact on geotourism. Map points with qualitative information based on direction of view would be a way to provide tourists with specific information on locations they visit. In fact, geotourism could very well be the nexus of professional and consumer uses of GPS technologies. Geotourism allows self-curated explorations of urban and historic landscapes. Guided by a GPS device, a tourist can be directed to specific locations with either a map of points or GPS coordinates loaded into their GPS receiver or smart phone. With an emphasis on direction, tourist focus can center on a view of an historic event or building. GPS-located points can include historic information, such as historic photos and media that describe a location in detail. Using professional GPS, placemark locations can be more accurately defined. With consumer-grade GPS, such as we have in our cell phones, those places can be accessed and explored in more meaningful ways. Location awareness becomes a two way street. Not only are we located more easily but we can become more aware of our locations.

Arlington Rebuilds a Community and its Roots

By Douglas Gordon, Hon. ALA

The Shelton was the first of AHC and Bonstra|Haresign's additions to the Nauck community. It serves as a welcoming center piece for families new to the historic community.

Nauck is a historic black community in southern Arlington County that in recent decades had skirted the fringe of losing its identity. One of a handful of Freedmen's communities that flourished in the region before and after the Civil War, Nauck continued through a long litany of hardships and, subsequently, a gradual loss of identity. It was the strong role of the county planners and consultants, taking their cue from community groups—including area churches—that brought both revitalization and a re-establishment of the old sense of neighborhood.

Working with community groups, Arlington County formed the Nauck Village Center plan in 2004 and—with planners and designers Rhodeside & Harwell Inc., Clark Nexsen, Development Economics, Gensler & Associates, and the Lukmire Partnership—developed and began implementing the Nauck Town Square Plan from 2006 on. The form-based master plan blended high-density and affordable housing with a community center, and an adjacent school and playgrounds.

Part of the vision was to replace a 1960s 22-unit apartment building with a 94-unit complex that would include street retail, an enclosed play area, and direct connection to the still-planned town square at Shirlington and 24th roads.

The Shelton

A vital driver for getting the first apartment complex built, the Shelton, was AHC Inc., a private, nonprofit developer of affordable housing based in Arlington. Founded in 1975, AHC produces and preserves affordable housing, provides homeownership services, and offers residents onsite educational services. AHC worked in close cooperation with the Arlington Department of Community Planning, Housing, and Development.

Once AHC got involved with replacing the 22-unit apartment building they learned of the Nauck plan and the county's incentives to spur redevelopment, including tax abatements and additional density. "We realized that if we were going to have a bigger impact, we'd have to buy some adjacent parcels," recalls AHC Multifamily Group Vice President John M. Welsh.

AHC also became familiar with the Bonder & Amanda Johnson Community Development Corporation (BAJCDC), founded in 1999 to maintain the Nauck community's presence in the face of imminent gentrification of the area due to its prime location. The BAJCDC had been working with the Macedonia Baptist Church to acquire land for development of affordable housing, including a parcel across the street from the church.

Through conversations with the church and BAJCDC leaders, AHC found that their apartment-building vision had not gone forward but that they had already been working with architects Bonstra|Haresign. "We were looking for an architect for the Shelton, and we wanted to try somebody new," Welsh says. Via many meetings, the county and community agreed that the development would enhance the neighborhood greatly. The developer got financial support from the county in return for both additional affordable units and community space. "We got it built and leased out very quickly," Welsh says. "It's been a good asset for us."

The Shelton, U-shaped in plan, includes a landscaped interior courtyard open at one end yet secure from the street by a code-locked gate.

Interior finishes and a grand street façade give the Shelton considerable consumer appeal far above the gone-but-not-missed 1960s-era Section 8 apartment building it replaced.

The Macedonian, built on land owned by the Baptist church just across the street, was intended for older residents and has proved a magnet for parishioners and people who had moved from the neighborhood.

The Macedonian

The project that resulted from the BAJCDC plan, opened in May 2011 and also designed by Bonstra|Harsign with AHC, is the Macedonian, a 36-unit project that includes ground floor space for a community business/employment-opportunity incubator. The Macedonian is also the most energy-efficient multi-family affordable new housing building in Northern Virginia, according to the architect. It is the first such project in Arlington certified by EarthCraft, a sustainable-housing-construction body for the Southeast U.S. based in Georgia.

"The Macedonia Baptist Church certainly played a big role in this project," says Arlington City Council Member Christopher Zimmerman. He points in particular to the strong role of area churches, including the Lomax AME Zion and Mt. Zion Baptist churches. In addition to church pastors, Zimmerman is grateful for community organizers, he says, including long-time Nauck Civic Association President Dr. Alfred O. Taylor Jr., who believes "those plans are most successful that are most based in the community."

"The concept of The Arlington Way is that the community has to be integrally involved in what we're planning to do," Zimmerman explains. "The consciousness of a strong community with deep roots and strong feelings imbues the whole redevelopment process."

"We wanted to be able to partner with someone who had a shared mission," recalls the Rev. Leonard Hamlin Sr., pastor of the Macedonia Baptist Church. "We were already working with our architect when we began talking to several developers and saw an opportunity for a shared mission with AHC. We owned the land and brought them on board.

An Earthcraft-certified apartment complex, the Macedonian features green amenities inside and out, including this green roof to entice residents out into the sunlight and fresh air.

"It was a challenging learning process working with the developer, architects, and planners," Hamlin adds. "When you bring that many different people to the table, you tend to have competing interests. And everyone has to play their particular role in the process, and strongly. One that we played was to advocate for the community. What most people fear is rapid gentrification; immediate transitions of certain neighborhoods. We reminded everybody what the project was really all about: benefit for people in the community and having an open door for more people to come in."

"They were prepared to go ahead and redevelop their property, but they had no experience," Welsh recalls. "So we set out together as their joint-venture development partner and we got that done."

"AHC is a pretty remarkable affordable housing developer," adds Bonstral/Haresign Principal David Haresign, FAIA. "They hired us initially because they thought that we'd make their affordable housing look market rate. And, judging from the comments we've received from residents and the community, we delivered."

Welsh returns the compliment: "It's good to find an architect who understands the business of development: the practical matters of getting approvals, what things are going to cost, what the salient design issues are, and how we resolve them."

The two new apartment buildings and streetscape improvements are just a beginning but have already changed the feel and spirit of a community willing to work hard for that transformation.

For the people in the county and people in the community, Welsh concludes: "There was an increase in the affordable housing and a notable public investment in infrastructure. And to have two new housing resources that were well-designed and provide good services, this development also has encouraged some people who had moved away to come back and re-establish their roots in the neighborhood."

Land Swap Creates a Smooth Transition

For decades, Wilson Boulevard from Roslyn to Ballston has been the pride of Arlington's transit-oriented development. Over the past two decades or so the county facilitated the replacement of low-rise commercial and residential units along the corridor, dating mostly from the 1940s and '50s, with mid- and high-rise apartment, hotel, and office buildings along with street-level retail strongly supported by Metro's bus and rail services.

Once Wilson moves southwest past Glebe Road, though, the edge-cityscape settles into a more suburban mix of garden apartment complexes and single-family neighborhoods. That transition was once demarcated by the eye-catching diamond-necklace façade of the Bob Peck Chevrolet showroom. When that went away in 2008, it left a transitional gap at one of Arlington's best-known crossroads.

Enter the JBG Companies, a high-end developer that brought on Cooper Cary to design a 10-story mixed-use office building to anchor that site. The building's sweeping 10-story curtain-wall façade accentuates the sight lines of both North Glebe Road and Wilson Boulevard and includes its own diamond necklace at street level to emulate the former dealership's signature identity.

The rest of the story

At the same time, JBG planned a block of high-end townhouses for the adjacent lot, and affordable-housing developer AHC owned a nearby parcel on which it wanted to replace a 21-apartment property and a subdivided house with a 90-unit apartment building.

Arlington County wanted the affordable housing as well as an acceptable transition between the signature 800 Glebe Road building and the low-rise residential areas beyond.

"The neighborhood drove this development in many ways," says AHC Vice President John Welsh. "They had a very solid civic association with a lot of support. They were steadfast and there was not a lot of vitriol, so the county council members took them very seriously."

The central courtyard, with its intermittent-flow fountain and greenery, provides residents with play space that seems far away—and is secure from—the busy traffic corridors that course just around the corner.

The site AHC had to develop was small, which would require a tall building. Neighbors didn't like that and, initially, JBG did not want to be involved with AHC. Both developers' projects languished while the civic association debated acceptable building heights and the county continued to push for affordable housing units. Eventually, JBG warmed to the idea of somehow incorporating the affordable housing development into their overall plan.

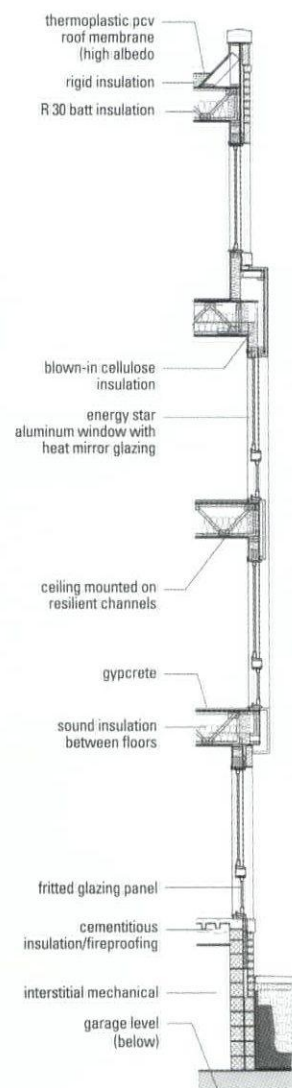

"We ultimately got together on a mutual arrangement for working together and going through the site-plan approval process," Welsh remembers. The resulting solution included a swap of parcels that put the Earthcraft-certified, 90-unit Jordan, designed by Bonstra|Haresign, next to 800 Glebe. The 19 luxury townhomes, now under construction by JBG, go on the lot originally owned by AHC and serve as an elegant transition to the existing neighborhoods to the southwest. The market-rate and affordable-housing developer partnership ended up being close enough that parking for the new AHC units is sandwiched into the parking levels for the JBG mixed-use office building.

"The Jordan land swap was a little tricky," says Arlington County Council Member Christopher Zimmerman. "On the one hand you have a major high-value real-estate deal on Glebe Road. On the other hand, we have a residential neighborhood. Those are politically sensitive, and one of the things that Arlington has been particularly successful with is its transitions between high-density areas near Metro to much lower density single-family neighborhoods. Part of the challenge of this kind of development is creating less of a barrier and more of a transition. The county considered this to be a terminal vista going west on Wilson Boulevard, and we wanted something there that made a statement."

"People viewed our affordable housing project as a great transitional use and physical step-down from Ballston's high-rises to Bluemont's townhouses and single-family residences," summarizes Bonstra|Haresign Principal David Haresign, FAIA, of the balancing act. "We essentially rode JBG's coat-tails on the entitlements side and gave JBG the public benefit they needed to get approval."

Search by Firm Name

The architecture firms listed in this directory have a principal who is a member of the VSAIA. There may be other principals or employees of the firm who are not listed. Firms are listed alphabetically beginning on this page.

This listing includes the four primary areas of a firm's practice, although other types of projects aren't necessarily excluded from the firm's range of work.

Each firm has selected up to five of their recently completed projects. If you're considering hiring a firm, consider visiting some of the buildings listed. Ask the building owners about their experience with the firm and if they're satisfied with the project.

In each firm listing you'll find:

- Name, address and phone number
- Firm principals and personnel levels
- Principal areas of practice
- Recent projects

Timely Prefinished Opening Concept ▲

- Frame prefinished and installed AFTER the drywall is applied and painted.
- Frame anchors every 11" on both sides making the frame part of the structure.
- Frame installs in two trips to the opening: material distribution and installation labor
- Frame allows for snap-on casing options
- Casing corner connector holds mitered casing corners in a tight fixed position
- Hardware preparations are embossed

for Construction

Build with an added layer of protection.

PLUS download the all-new Guide for Sustainable Projects, FREE at aia.org/sustainableprojectsguide

Take peace of mind to the next level with AIA Contract Documents. We are pleased to announce the new D503™-2011, Guide for Sustainable Projects, including Agreement Amendments and Supplementary Conditions. This guide provides users with a valuable reference tool when using key AIA standard contracts like A201-2007, the most widely used Owner/Contractor agreement in the industry, to help address the unique concerns of sustainable construction. This includes information on certification systems, codes and legislation affecting sustainable design and construction projects. It also includes model language to assist all project participants in appropriately allocating risks and responsibilities. AIA Contract Documents are easy-to-use, widely accepted, and fair and balanced for all parties involved.

Download the new Guide for Sustainable Projects and learn more about our full library of Contract Documents at aia.org/contractdocs or call 800-242-3837.
